A double-sided suspended round mirror

Attached to a painted iron pole, suspended from the ceiling, detached from any wall, this object allows space to flow around it. An architectural abstraction of a leaf on a branch. The mirror revolves around its pole as well as around its own axis, presenting a different reflection scale on each side. As it turns it is transformed from a plain to a line. The motion reveals the red color of the inner frame, presenting yet another play of plains and lines as they are reflected in the revolving mirror.
